Reshape Europe

Friedrich Naumann Foundation for Freedom Global Campaign

Europe is facing a multitude of serious challenges: The Russian war of aggression against Ukraine and the Covid-19 pandemic represent the most recent crises, which have detrimental effects on people's lives and our liberal order. Within its own borders, anti-democratic populism and illiberal developments are challenging the EU as a self-proclaimed "community of values". In the new world order, which is characterized by strategic rivalry between authoritarian states on the one hand and liberal democracies on the other, these are alarming signals. Whether Europe succeeds in facing up to these challenges is therefore of global significance. The EU must show that free and democratic societies are best equipped to master major challenges.

Following the motto "Reshape Europe," we are therefore launching a global dialogue on how Europe can become more resilient in order to stand up to the enemies of freedom worldwide. This requires bold steps that strengthen the EU internally as well as externally: How can we strengthen European defense capabilities and thus make the EU a serious global player in security policy? How can the EU's economic power be strengthened and its supply of raw materials and energy become less dependent on authoritarian regimes?

What can the EU learn from other world regions in this regard? How to truly integrate and unite the EU politically so that it, together with its partners, is capable of defending the liberal world order as a global actor with a common voice?

As a global foundation, we look beyond Europe's borders when answering these questions and involve our international network of expertise and partners. Around the world, we are looking for answers to defend the free world - what are we waiting for?

As liberals, we at the Friedrich Naumann Foundation for Freedom want the European model of free and democratic societies to prevail against authoritarian systems. Therefore, the democratic model needs to regain its appeal inside and outside the EU.

The values of liberal democracy are under threat. The EU, as a unique area of peace, prosperity and common law, has a special responsibility to defend the model of liberal democracies. To this end, the EU must be strengthened - both internally and externally. The motto is: Let's #ReshapeEurope, together!

“Greece belongs to the West”, former Greek Prime Minister Konstantin Karamanlis proclaimed more than 40 years ago, and in the decades to follow Greece has indeed integrated, step by step, ever more deeply into the European institutions.

But the road has been a rocky one at times, and it’s no good pretending otherwise. With this in mind, we at Friedrich Naumann Foundation for Freedom in Greece decided to take stock of the way Greeks feel about Europe and the EU, and of Germany in particular, some ten years after the beginnings of the debt crisis. We are grateful to our partner KAPA Research for conducting this survey.

As liberals, we believe we are called upon to face tensions in order to overcome them, and we need to preserve the ability to look each other in the eye with respect and trust, regardless of differences of opinion. Has the time come to close the book on the deepest crisis in Greek-German relations after World War II? We don’t think so. But we are hoping a new chapter can be opened, and we would wish for this survey to mark a starting point for a new discussion discovering each other.

Let’s remember it’s only seven years ago that in the capitals of many European countries including Berlin people were thinking very loudly about Grexit, and Greek polls from that time showed that less than a quarter of the population had positive feelings about the EU. Let us think for a minute of the price so many Greeks had to pay for the crisis in very personal terms.

Fortunately, those troubled times are over. Greece has remained in the Eurozone, the country is slowly but surely recovering from the debt crisis, and discourse between Brussels and Athens has returned to civilized forms. Even if the Greeks will have to bear the legacy of the crisis for a long time to come, cautious optimism is spreading: the economy is growing, the EU’s fiscal supervision has ended, and the country is hopeful to return to the group of investment grade countries by 2023.

However, the debt crisis was not the only crisis that Greece had to face in the recent past: The refugee crisis and the coronavirus pandemic followed, both of which hit the Greeks particularly hard. Measures taken by the EU in these contexts have not necessarily contributed to a better image of the Union in Greece.

So what about European-Greek relations today, more than ten years after? How do Greeks perceive the EU today? Do they feel European? Do they see their country’s future in the EU and in the common currency? Do people trust the EU institutions, especially when it comes to crisis management? Or do we see, as in other member states, a growing Euroscepticism? How do the Greeks feel towards deeper integration of the Union or about EU enlargement?

How does Russia’s aggressive war against Ukraine affect perception of the EU in Greece, and how do people feel about Russia after February 24th? After all, Greece and Russia have had a special relationship with each other over time, the history of which dates back to the emergence of the modern Greek state in 1832.

We investigated these and many other questions in this study. The survey was conducted in September 2022.

We at FNF will pay special attention to the subject of reshaping Europe in 2022 and 2023, as we feel we need to grow together again in Europe, in the face of a new totalitarian imperialism emanating from the Kremlin.

There are many reasons to build bridges between Greece and Germany today. This requires, on both sides, a willingness to leave the comfort zone. We hope this survey will encourage readers to do so.

Dear readers,

The publication you are holding in your hands is the first attempt by the Friedrich Naumann Foundation for Freedom (FNF) and the Greece and Cyprus Office to assess the attitude of Greek public opinion towards Europe and the European Union.

The survey focuses on our country's participation in the European Union and NATO, the perceptions regarding the institutions of the European Union and Europe in general, the assessment of Greek-German relations and Germany as a whole, while it also concerns more specific issues concerning the prevailing attitude towards Russia's invasion of Ukraine and the management of the energy crisis.

I have to admit that my first reading of the results of the survey, conducted in cooperation with KAPA Research, was deeply troubling.

The survey highlights a deep division, most likely a result of the "Memorandum" era, regarding the assessment of the impact of Greece's entry into the EU, the effectiveness of European institutions in managing policies and crises, the desire or reluctance to enlarge and deepen the European Union.

More specifically, the first question already reveals a strong division among Greeks as to their overall assessment of the European Union, with 48% of citizens describing it as positive and 50% of citizens describing it as negative. In a similar question, on the overall assessment of Greece's progress in the EU, 58% of respondents consider that the country has probably not benefited or even been harmed by its EU accession. The percentages are similarly divided in respondents' assessment of whether Greece is an equal member within the EU, with 44% saying yes and another 44% saying no, with the lowest levels of agreement concentrated particularly among young people.

The findings, compared to previous surveys, reveal a significant difference with the pre-crisis period. A typical example of such a change is the finding on citizens' trust in institutions. Indicatively, the institutions in which citizens have the greatest confidence nowadays is the European Court of Justice (60%) and the European Parliament (43%), which are far below the corresponding rates in 2008, which were at 82% and 79% respectively.

At the same time, and despite their considerable disappointment, a large percentage of citizens do not seem too keen to leave the EU or the Eurozone.

For instance, on whether the country would be better off with the euro or the drachma, 57% are in favor of the euro compared to 33% who prefer the drachma; however, in a similar question on their potential stance in a future referendum, only 25% say they would vote to leave the Eurozone, compared to 67% who would vote to remain in the monetary union.

In addition, citizens are particularly positive about the common course of the country within the EU in terms of a common European defense policy and the European military, a common European foreign policy, a common European energy policy and a common European fiscal policy.

A closer look at the data, reveals an optimistic perspective, which gradually and effortlessly emerges. According to 74% of the respondents, Greece belongs in Europe, while 71% believe that the country's future will be better within the EU.

Overall, one cannot overlook the slow but gradually steady return of perceptions and attitudes to pre-crisis levels, even in a period of managing a difficult energy crisis and generalized insecurity with the war against Ukraine raging next to European borders. In 2008 the positive assessment of the European Union, reached its highest percentage (83%), contrary to 2015 when the EU's assessment hit its lowest percentage (34%); nowadays, the positive perception of the EU seems to have recovered (48%).

Despite its various problems needed to be addressed, the European Union remains a place of peace, cooperation, freedom and respect for human rights, and Greek European citizens recognise this aspect.

Surveys such as ours, I believe, demonstrate that the current era can be an opportunity to renew European ties and faith in the values of freedom, the rule of law and liberal democracy, on the basis upon which the Union was born.

This is the message that we can carry as institutions, civil society actors, state, organizations and think tanks, working towards improving the European intergration, proposing and implementing the necessary reforms to bridge the gaps between European leadership and the needs of European citizens, and those who share a vision of a united Europe as a model of democracy.

Europe and Greece: a common destiny

The integration of Greece into the European community symbolized - and in fact was - a means for progress: ensuring national integrity after the Turkish invasion of Cyprus (1974), stability in Greek politics after decades of turbulent history, termination of economic backwardness and convergence with the other European societies and their high standard of living. Until the 2010s, being a pro-European, a supporter of the Union was almost a given; since Europe, in the eyes of Greeks, was - at the same time - an ideal and a social prerogative.

FNF's public opinion survey on "EUROPE" reveals that the future of Greece is concomitant with the common European destiny. Almost 6 in 10 citizens (58%) positively assess the country's participation in the EU; a trend with remarkable stability since 2001 (60%) and 2012 (51%). Thanks to its European integration, Greece experienced social progress (58%), increased its influence in the Balkans and the world (46%), enjoyed economic stability and prosperity (43%), and strengthened its Democracy (39%). The final assessment is, in other words, positive; especially if one considers the country's sensitive geographical position and the constant concern around "national issues", which EU membership has neither benefited nor harmed (40%).

Since the 2010s, the relationship between Greece and the EU has been changing, experiencing considerable fluctuations, without, however, ever reaching a point of a final rift. The painful socio-economic reforms imposed by the troika's (EU Commission, ECB, IMF) management of the Greek debt crisis have been recorded as a "trauma" in the collective unconscious and have caused major ideological and political shifts within the country that still determine the balance of its political system: the space from the Left to the Centre-Left - which was once distinguished for its internationalism or pro-Europeanism - appears much more hesitant towards Europe, its institutions, its policies and its managerial competence than the Centre-Right, which was once occupied by intense ethnocentrism. Likewise, convergence with Europe remains an important issue at stake for the parties that managed it for decades (ND-PA-SOK/KINAL) compared to the parties that emerged from the "anti-austerity" tsunami during the 2010s.

Today, more than 7 out of 10 citizens (74%) believe that Greece belongs to Europe, returning to the level of 2008 (74%) - the year in which the highest rates of "Greek Europeanism" were recorded - after the pivotal 2010 when public opinion was split in half (47% pro - 49% against). Today, it is the country's equal participation in the EU that is being questioned (44% of respondents agree, 44% disagree). After all, it is no coincidence that in this survey all the economic components - that is the set of questions related to the economic/fiscal dimension of the EU - record lower acceptance rates, without, however, turning into revisionism.

Since the start of the debt crisis, Greek public opinion has been converging with the skepticism recorded in other European societies. A skepticism with roots in the rising economic inequality, the migration waves from Africa and Asia, the Brexit turmoil, the handling of more recent crises such as the pandemic, the war in Ukraine and the energy crisis, as well as the very identity crisis of the EU. However, Greek skepticism differs essentially from the rigid Euroscepticism of other countries that forms distinct groups who challenge the status quo (e.g. Visegrad), strengthens the far Right (even in founding countries like France) or, more recently in Italy, it brings about a post-fascist party questioning the famous quote of Benedetto Croce, founder of the Italian Liberal Party, that "Fascism was a mere parenthesis".

The overall citizen opinion on the EU should also be interpreted in this light: 48% is the percentage of those who view the EU positively and 50% of those who view it negatively. This 50-50 balance was not always stable. A positive opinion of the EU was held by 83% of citizens in 2008 and 64% in 2010. Similarly, the level of trust Greeks have in European institutions such as the European Court of Justice and the European Parliament is high (60% and 43% respectively), but as far as other community bodies are concerned (Council of Europe, European Council, European Commission) a significant decline is observed since 2008, with percentages stabilizing at around 32%-35%. Greek public opinion follows the overall trend of declining confidence in the EU and its institutions, also evident in the Eurobarometer surveys.

The decline of trust in European institutions does not necessarily imply a decline in the acceptance of the policies they implement. On the contrary, 72% of the citizens are in favor of a deeper Union, i.e., they support implementation of common policies in defense and the creation of a European army (75%), in foreign policy (73%), in energy (70%), as well as in fiscal policy (62%). A set of policies with federal characteristics that matches the success of other popular EU policies such as free movement of people, student exchange, or the European Structural and Investment Funds (or the National Strategic Reference Framework - "ESPA" - programs, as widely referred to in Greece).

In the "euro vs drachma" dilemma, Greek society seems to have given its final answer by associating the single currency with a more certain future and a European way forward: 57% is the percentage of those who think that things are better with the euro and 33% the percentage of those who think that things would be better off with the drachma. If a Grexit referendum were to be held tomorrow, 67% would vote to stay in the eurozone and 25% to leave, a trend that has remained steady since 2009 (with a short parenthesis during the Greek bailout referendum month, back in 2015). Variations, however, are recorded between different social groups. Larger shares of 'leave' supporters are detected among young people aged 17-34, who have not known any currency other than the euro and literally grew up in the debt crisis, but also in Northern Greece where the strongest combination of unemployment, poverty and political deficit is found. The workers/farmers and the smaller parties take a clear position to leave the euro.

In times of crisis, the EU is perceived as a windproof protective “fence” by 77% of respondents, especially in view of an upcoming difficult winter for which the majority is worried about shortages in heating energy (73%), food and basic goods (47%), and a solidarity crisis in the EU (69%). Specifically, on the issue of crisis management, criticism concerns the clumsy reflexes of the Union: although 66% evaluate the EU’s response to the pandemic positively, Greek people negatively assess its handling of the war in Ukraine (63%), inflation (67%), the energy crisis (76%), immigration (79%), and, clearly, the Greek debt crisis (82%). This negative attitude, though, should not be analyzed as is, without considering the strong desire to deepen the EU. Greece has changed from a country that initially sought EU membership to satisfy its local interests, to one that renders special importance to the political development of Europe, mainly because it was often treated as an “exile” by the European family.

Finally, in an uncertain international environment of evolving crises and in such a neighborhood of conflicts as Southeast Europe, 78% of citizens want Greece to remain a member of NATO, 46% side with the West in the West-Russia conflict, 56% believe that the accession of the Western Balkans to the EU will bring greater stability to the Balkans and the broader region, while 38% trust the EU more than the US in dealing with international issues. In other words, we return to the original thought of K. Karamanlis the elder, for whom joining the (then) EEC was aimed more at security and less at economic prosperity.

A note on the weaker social groups

Those with lower education, those who make ends meet with great difficulty, the workers, the farmers, the unemployed, the weakest strata of Greek society, feel cut off from the European and global reality, at a time when the major parties - ND, PASOK/KINAL, SYRIZA

- have shifted their attention towards the middle and upper groups of the population, those groups who feel benefited from European integration and globalization. Among these ‘have-nots’ the survey records the highest rates of negative opinion of the EU and its institutions, as well as a negative assessment of the country’s European integration - mainly in terms of economic stability and prosperity. They align themselves with Russia and are generally suspicious of Euro-Atlantic institutions. They oppose any further deepening of the monetary union and believe their life was better off with the drachma.

An undeniably worrying picture saved by the fact that in a potential Grexit referendum they would eventually vote in favor of the euro (51%).

These groups associate the fate of Greece with that of Europe and support the preservation of the European prerogative. They, also, encourage the deepening of federal policies such as common foreign, defense, energy, and fiscal policies. Their reservations towards the European project stem from the domestic political system’s inability to integrate these weaker groups into the European process and to convince them that the EU is not undermining national sovereignty; that it is not an elitist bureaucratic and wasteful “club” that lacks democratic legitimacy and transparency; that it does more than serving the business elites at the expense of the working class; and that it is not solely responsible for austerity policies and high levels of immigration.

Because it is in this way, the once “non-privileged” groups - who starred in the democratic course of Greek metapolitefsi - are now left naked to the hands of demagoguery of the left and the right, something that did already destabilize the country in the previous decade and may emerge even more unpredictable in face of the new challenges of the current decade.

Alexander Skouras

President at the Center for Liberal Studies (KEFiM)

Reading the FNF survey findings, I was reminded of Friedrich Hayek's warning from 1949, that to win the battle of ideas against illiberalism we should "make the philosophic foundations of a free society once more a living intellectual issue, and its implementation a task which challenges the ingenuity and imagination of our liveliest minds".

Of course, much has changed since 1949. What remains the same though, is the intensity of the challenges liberal democracy is facing - both from despotic and totalitarian regimes from abroad, and from populists at home that target disillusioned citizens who feel that liberal democracies don't deliver on their promises anymore, at least not for them.

As shown by the survey, Greeks have mixed feelings towards the EU. The things they value most about it is its liberal core: free movement of people, goods, services, and capital. They also feel that Greece belongs to Europe and do not think of leaving EU, the euro-zone, or the west; they believe that Greece has benefited from its EU membership and that our country's future is better inside than outside the EU. 7 out of 10 respondents favor the further deepening of the EU.

And at the same time, Greeks do not trust EU institutions; they rate poorly the European response to the recent crises, except for the pandemic; those who have a negative general opinion on the EU outnumber the positive replies by 50 to 48. What's most concerning is that negative responses are heavier among young people who are experiencing worse living conditions and prospects than the previous generational cohort.

The takeaway seems to be that Greeks still believe in the EU, not for what it currently is but for what it stands for and could become. And the same seems to hold true for several EU countries.

Against this backdrop, Europe needs to turn the current crises into opportunities to reassert its place and mission in a changing world.

First, by defending liberal democracy against revisionist aggressors. EU's stance against the Russian invasion in Ukraine still leaves a lot to be desired. Most of all, Europe should realize that politics without a strong commitment to liberal democracy and the values it stands for is no longer a pragmatic choice.

Second, by showing that liberal democracy still works. Europe needs to prove once again that openness, diversity of opinion, individual and civil liberty are strengths – not liabilities; it needs to speak to young men and women in Greece and elsewhere who feel that they do not have the opportunities they were promised. It is no wonder that even in today's Greece the liberal tenets of the EU, the four freedoms, are considered its most valuable feature.

European liberals should spearhead this movement. We have both the analytical tools and the policy proposals that can give Europe the impetus it needs to become a bastion of freedom, prosperity, and opportunity once again.

We do have the liveliest minds around. What remains to be seen, is whether we can mobilize them for the cause of our free society. That's the challenge ahead.

Europhilia? – A commentary on the Ups and Downs of Greek Public Opinion on the European Union (EU)

Everyone is fond of numbers: the political parties, the media, the political analysts – and above all the pollsters who supply the stats. What all these players have in common - with different objectives in each case - is the desire to understand what society, the much-cited man in the street, thinks.

Opinion polls have long since become an important pillar of political life. Critics speak of a dominance of demoscopia and warn of the “rule of the two thousand.” This is the number of people who are often polled in a representative survey as a surrogate for society as a whole.

Greece has seen an explosion of opinion polls in recent years. On a regular basis, the media publish polls that primarily seek to map the popularity of political parties and their leaders. Even the smallest fluctuations in their scores become front-page headlines. There are accusations that the polls favor one side or the other, have limited objectivity and are instrumentalized by those who pay for them.

The survey at hand is of a different quality. The aim here is to understand how the Greek population feels about the European Union (EU) and where Greeks see the challenges and the opportunities of integration. This data provides an empirical basis for political dialogue, including that between Germany and Greece, and is therefore an enrichment in any case.

A veritable treasure trove

On 212 densely printed pages, we find a large collection of data with thousands of pieces of information. The report is a veritable treasure trove for all those concerned with Greece and the country's relations with Europe.

On a general note, due to the sheer size of the data the analysis of surveys will always have to be selective - and give focus. The idea is to analyze and comment on the figures - and in a next step, to discuss these in a political and historical context.

Where there is light, there is also shadow, we say in my language. Applied to the results of the survey, we could also say: Where there is shadow, there is also light.

At the very beginning stands a negative finding. How else should we interpret that today merely 48 percent of Greeks have a positive opinion of the European Union? This comment is all the more appropriate given that the percentage of Greeks with a positive opinion of the EU was almost twice as high back in 2008, at a - downright sensational - 83 %.

That was in 2008, before the financial crisis, which not only upset the lives of the vast majority of Greeks, but at the same time triggered the most serious crisis in relations in Greece's forty years of EU- membership. The wounds the crisis has created - on both sides - are far from healed. This is especially true for the Greek side, as this study demonstrates at various points.

Incoherent picture

I spoke of light and shadow - and could also apply the image of the glass being half full or half empty. For me, the most astonishing message of the current study is the “duality”, one could also speak of incoherence of the Greeks' views on their relationship with the EU.

While - as mentioned at the beginning - more than half of Greeks today do not have a positive opinion of the EU, at the same time 58 % believe that EU-membership has benefited them.

In the better years - i.e. before the crisis - this figure was a staggering 94%. It would be interesting to examine how the negative opinion and the statement that membership is useful go together. The numbers reveal an almost schizophrenic relationship. This duality of negative opinion and Europhilia is also reflected in the finding that 74% of Greeks say that their country belongs to the EU. It is interesting to note that - unlike other figures - this indicator is stable over the decades. In 2008, the group of people who said that Greece did not belong to the EU was 25%, the same as today. Greece's EU-opponents are politically at home at the extremes, on the left and right fringes. Remarkably, 30% of SYRIZA supporters would rather see their country outside the EU.

We find further evidence of the Greeks' Europhilia in the answers to the question of whether it is better for the country's future to be inside or outside the EU. Here, 71% of people are in favor of a future inside the EU.

The relevance of the survey is increased by the fact that it also covers current political events. I will limit myself here to two findings of particular interest in my eyes.

The enlargement of the EU to include new members is a topic of great importance, not least for Athens' relations with neighboring countries in the Balkans. 47 % of respondents are in favor of admitting new members; as many as 43 % are opposed to this eventuality. I find the results even more interesting when we look at the countries in question. The highest level of acceptance is recorded for Serbia's admission, at 69 %; the lowest level of support is for Turkey's EU membership, standing at just 13 %. Rejection of Turkish admission is 92 % among New Democracy (ND) supporters, significantly higher than among SYRIZA (74 %) and KINAL (80) followers.

EU vs. US

That party political leanings play a role in foreign policy preferences is reflected also in the results on the question of whether people trust the EU or the U.S. more to solve important international issues. Here, 38 % give their vote to the EU. One might think this is a respectable result. In a historical perspective, however, this figure documents a drastic loss of confidence among Greeks regarding the EU's competence to solve international problems. For in 2008, 81 % of Greeks believed the EU was more relevant than the U.S. in this field. The big beneficiary of the EU's fall from grace is the United States which has risen from a meager 2 % (in 2008) to 24 % today on this issue. What is most remarkable is that among ND supporters, trust in the U.S. is higher than trust in the EU to resolve international conflicts.

This brings me to my final observation – where again, a “dualism” is difficult to overlook. The answers to the question about the importance of common policies in the EU fall into the Europhilia category. 76 % of Greeks favor a common EU defense policy and 73 % favor a common EU foreign policy.

However, the commitment to a unified European policy reaches its limits when it comes to the war in Ukraine and the European responses. The EU has taken a clear position in this matter enacting a series of sanctions packages against Moscow. Among the majority of Greeks, this European strategy does not find support - on the contrary, 55 % of respondents believe economic sanctions punishing Moscow for the aggression against Ukraine should not continue.

Demoscopic surveys, like this one on Greek attitudes toward the EU, offer a treasure trove of data. As such, the numbers are objective, provided the respondents tell the truth. The experts' analysis and interpretation of the data help contextualize the information, interpret it, and reach conclusions. At this stage, subjective criteria, once again, take on a role.
